account of the year's work and of the present condition of the institution. The number of infants received into the Foundling House during the year was fourteen, five of which number succumbed to infantile diseases after admission. This is a large mortality, but, as the report explains, the children are received at the most delicate age and in many cases after they have suffered from exposure, and it is therefore not to be wondered at that a great percentage of the foundlings die very young, notwithstanding the most careful nursing. The number of girls at present under the care of the institution is 79, and of this number the grown-up girls who have completed their schooling are not less under instruction in very useful things than those who sit on the school benches, as they are being taught to perform many kinds of household work, Good accounts of former inmates of the institution are always being obtained, and many of the daughters of the house give gratifying evidences of their affection for their old home.
